Criminal law - Giving Gun Rights Back to the Wrong People: The United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit Takes a Bite Out of the Federal Firearm Prohibition in Wyoming; United States v. Hays, 526 F.3d 674 (10th Cir. 2008)

David Shields
CASE NOTE

CRIMINAL LAW—Giving Gun Rights Back to the Wrong People:
The United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit
Takes a Bite Out of The Federal Firearm Prohibition in Wyoming:
United States v. Hays, 526 F.3d 674 (10th Cir. 2008).

David Shields*

INTRODUCTION

Due to the use of outdated thinking, individuals who commit crimes of domestic violence rarely face felony prosecution.1 Seldom do domestic offenders incur prosecution at all; those who do will, at most, face misdemeanor charges.2
This unfortunate result often stems from a plea agreement.3 Ironically, one-third of these crimes would qualify as felonies if committed by a stranger.4 In comparison to similar forms of criminal behavior, domestic violence rarely receives equivalent prosecutionary treatment.5

On March 27, 2003, the Fremont County Sheriffs’ Department issued Steven Hays a misdemeanor citation for violating Wyoming’s simple assault and battery statute.6 Neither the citation issued to Hays, nor the subsequent judgment entered in the case, described the factual circumstances leading to his conviction.7 On September 22, 2006, a federal grand jury indicted Hays for possessing a firearm in violation of a federal statute prohibiting individuals convicted of a misdemeanor

* Candidate for J.D., University of Wyoming, 2010. I would like to thank my family and friends for their support during this project. Special thanks to Professor Lisa Rich for her assistance with this note. Additionally, I would like to express my immeasurable gratitude to John Barksdale.
Without you, this project would not have been possible; your assistance and words of encouragement will be missed.

1 United States v. Hays, 526 F.3d 674 (10th Cir. 2008); see Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Dept of Justice, NCJ 207846, Family Violence Statistics Including Statistics on Strangers and Mar. 19, 2009).

2 Hays, 526 F.3d at 680.

3 Id.; Adam W. Kersey, Misdemeanants, Firearms, and Discretion: The Practical Impact of The

4 Hays, 526 F.3d at 680.

5 Id.

6 Id. at 675; Wyo. Stat. Ann. § 6-2-501(b) (2008) ("A person is guilty of battery if he unlawfully touches another in a rude, insolent or angry manner or intentionally, knowingly or recklessly causes bodily injury to another.").

7 Hays, 526 F.3d at 675.
crime of domestic violence from possessing or transporting firearms. The grand jury also indicted Hays under 18 U.S.C. § 924(a)(2), which provides a sentencing court with statutory guidance for potential fines and imprisonment of individuals found in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9).

Hays’ prior conviction under Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) served as the predicate offense in the federal matter. Hays subsequently filed a Motion to Dismiss the indictment on January 22, 2007, contending his misdemeanor conviction did not meet the requirements of a crime of domestic violence under federal law. Hays argued his prior Wyoming conviction did not contain an element of “the use or attempted use of physical force, or the threatened use of a deadly weapon.”

In considering Hays’ motion, Judge Clarence Brimmer of the United States District Court for the District of Wyoming concluded a person could not make contact in a “rude, insolent or angry manner” without some level of physical force; thus, the language of the Wyoming battery statute satisfied the requirement for an element of physical force under 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii). Accordingly, Judge Brimmer denied the motion and Hays pled guilty, reserving his right to appeal. Judge Brimmer sentenced Hays to eighteen months in prison and three years of supervised release.

On appeal, Hays again argued that his prior conviction under Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) did not satisfy the use of physical force element required by 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)’s definition of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence.

---

It shall be unlawful for any person . . . who has been convicted in any court of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence, to ship or transport in interstate or foreign commerce, or possess in or affecting commerce, any firearm or ammunition; or to receive any firearm or ammunition which has been shipped or transported in interstate or foreign commerce.

9 Hays, 526 F.3d at 675; 18 U.S.C. § 924(a)(2) (“Whoever knowingly violates subsection (a) (6), (d), (g), (h), (i), (j), or (o) of section 922 shall be fined as provided in this title, imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.”).

10 Hays, 526 F.3d at 675.

11 Id.; 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) (West 2006) (defining a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence as an offense that “has, as an element, the use or attempted use of physical force, or the threatened use of a deadly weapon”).

12 Hays, 526 F.3d at 675.

13 Id. at 676.

14 Id. at 675–76.

15 Id. at 675 (Hays appealed this decision on May 2, 2008).
violence. In essence, Hays claimed the federal statute required more than the de minimis contact criminalized by Wyoming’s simple assault and battery statute.

The United States Attorney’s office, argued to the contrary, following the reasoning of the First, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits. It contended Hays’ domestic violence conviction under Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) satisfied 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)’s requirement for the use of “physical force” against the victim. The United States Attorney asserted the improbability of physically touching someone in a “rude, insolent, or angry manner” without also exerting some degree of physical force against that person. The United States Attorney concluded Wyoming’s statute met the definitional requirements of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) and therefore, a conviction under this statute constituted a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence. Such a conviction forbids offenders from possessing firearms.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit agreed with Hays and held that Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) does not satisfy the “use or attempted use of physical force” element of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii). In reaching this conclusion, the court rejected the reasoning of the First, Eighth and Eleventh Circuits. The Tenth Circuit reasoned those courts may be correct from a scientific perspective, but such a holding merges violent and non-violent offenses into one category. The Tenth Circuit held Wyoming’s simple assault and battery statute does not satisfy the requirement for an element of physical force.

This case note addresses the varying approaches federal courts utilize in determining whether statutes similar to Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501 satisfy the federal definition of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence. This note also 16 Brief of Petitioner-Appellant at 6, United States v. Hays, 526 F.3d 674, No. 07-8039 (10th Cir. Jul. 20, 2007).

---

17 Id.
18 See infra notes 44–55 and accompanying text (discussing if the statutory language is clear and unambiguous courts are bound to follow it as long as the results are neither unreasonable, nor absurd).
20 Id.
21 Id.
22 Id.
23 Id.
24 Id. at 680–81.
25 Id. at 681.
26 Id.
27 See infra notes 39–87 and accompanying text.
examines the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit’s opinion in United States v. Hays. 28 Finally, this case note illustrates the need for the United States Supreme Court to resolve the split of authority and provide a uniform interpretation of the behavior criminalized under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9). 29

BACKGROUND

Given the Hays court’s focus regarding whether Wyoming’s battery statute satisfied the federal definition of a crime of domestic violence, this section first discusses why Congress amended the Gun Control Act of 1968 by enacting 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9). 30 This section also explains the federal circuits’ varying interpretations of whether the federal definition of a crime of domestic violence under 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) criminalizes de minimis touches. 31

The Lautenberg Amendment

In 1996, Congress codified a firearm restriction for qualified domestic offenders, which prohibits criminals convicted of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence from possessing a firearm. 32 By enacting 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9), Congress aimed to close a “dangerous loophole” allowing violent offenders to possess firearms. 33 The amendment, known as the “Lautenberg Amendment,” relies on the prosecution of criminals under state substantive law. 34 This state conviction dependence gives states a significant role in the facilitation of federal criminal “policy and goals.” 35 Some commentators claim the use of state criminal proceedings as predicate offenses to federal firearm convictions not only has the potential to lead to an arbitrary application of the law, but also relinquishes federal lawmaking authority to the states. 36 These commentators contend federal

---

28 See infra notes 88–124 and accompanying text.
29 See infra notes 125–200 and accompanying text.
30 See infra notes 32–38 and accompanying text.
31 See infra notes 39–87 and accompanying text.
35 Logan, supra note 34, at 70, 90–96.
36 Id. at 90–96.
courts interpreting federal statutes having a foundation in state substantive law must be cognizant of these two concerns because of the far-reaching effects of the Amendment. Since no exemptions to the Lautenberg Amendment exist, convicted individuals who use firearms in their line of work must procure different forms of employment because they may no longer possess a firearm.

Interpretation of the Lautenberg Amendment within the Federal Courts

Currently, a split of authority exists among the circuit courts of appeals regarding the issue presented in United States v. Hays. The United States Courts of Appeals for the First, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits held the plain language of the statute should control. Under this view, the federal definition of domestic violence makes it clear that a person cannot make physical contact with another without rising to some level of physical force. Meanwhile, the Seventh and Ninth Circuits have adopted a standard requiring the violent use of physical force.

37 Id.

38 Radefeld, supra note 32.

Under the Lautenberg Amendment, if a law enforcement officer or a member of the military is convicted of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence, they cannot possess a firearm ever again. Such a conviction may result in loss of employment or permanent reassignment to a position that does not involve carrying or possessing a firearm.

Id.

39 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 n.4 (Ebel, J., dissenting), see generally John M. Skakun III, Violence and Contact: Interpreting “Physical Force” in the Lautenberg Amendment, 75 U. CHI. L. REV. 1833 (2008) (discussing the split amongst the federal circuits which recognize de minimis touching and courts which require a violent act to satisfy § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)).

40 See United States v. Griffith, 455 F.3d 1339, 1342 (11th Cir. 2006) (holding under the plain meaning rule, the “physical contact of an insulting or provoking nature” made illegal by Georgia Statute satisfied the “physical force” requirement of § 921(a)(33)(A)); United States v. Nason, 269 F.3d 10, 22 (1st Cir. 2001) (holding all convictions under the Maine statute necessarily involve, as an element, the use of “physical force”); United States v. Smith, 171 F.3d 617, 621 n.2 (8th Cir. 1999) (finding insulting or offensive contact, by necessity, requires physical force to complete).

41 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting).

42 See United States v. Belless, 338 F.3d 1063 (9th Cir. 2003). Belless pled guilty to battery in violation of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) and years later faced prosecution for violating 18 U.S.C. § 922(g). Id. at 1065. The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found that Wyoming’s battery statute encompassed less violent behavior than definitional requirements of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) and was too broad to qualify as a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence. Id. at 1069. The court therefore reversed the judgment and remanded the case. Id. at 1070. See also Flores v. Ashcroft, 350 F.3d 666 (7th Cir. 2003). Flores pled guilty in Indiana to battery, a misdemeanor under Indiana Code § 35-42-2-1, which criminalizes “rude, insolent, or angry” touching, as does Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b). Id. at 669. The Board of Immigration Appeals determined this offense qualified as a crime of domestic violence under 18 U.S.C.S. § 16 and ordered Flores’ removal from the country. Id. at 671. Upon review, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit found the issue was whether the offense created under the Indiana Code

---

37 Id.

38 Radefeld, supra note 32.

Id.

39 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 n.4 (Ebel, J., dissenting), see generally John M. Skakun III, Violence and Contact: Interpreting “Physical Force” in the Lautenberg Amendment, 75 U. CHI. L. REV. 1833 (2008) (discussing the split amongst the federal circuits which recognize de minimis touching and courts which require a violent act to satisfy § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)).

40 See United States v. Griffith, 455 F.3d 1339, 1342 (11th Cir. 2006) (holding under the plain meaning rule, the “physical contact of an insulting or provoking nature” made illegal by Georgia Statute satisfied the “physical force” requirement of § 921(a)(33)(A)); United States v. Nason, 269 F.3d 10, 22 (1st Cir. 2001) (holding all convictions under the Maine statute necessarily involve, as an element, the use of “physical force”); United States v. Smith, 171 F.3d 617, 621 n.2 (8th Cir. 1999) (finding insulting or offensive contact, by necessity, requires physical force to complete).

41 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting).

42 See United States v. Belless, 338 F.3d 1063 (9th Cir. 2003). Belless pled guilty to battery in violation of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) and years later faced prosecution for violating 18 U.S.C. § 922(g). Id. at 1065. The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found that Wyoming’s battery statute encompassed less violent behavior than definitional requirements of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) and was too broad to qualify as a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence. Id. at 1069. The court therefore reversed the judgment and remanded the case. Id. at 1070. See also Flores v. Ashcroft, 350 F.3d 666 (7th Cir. 2003). Flores pled guilty in Indiana to battery, a misdemeanor under Indiana Code § 35-42-2-1, which criminalizes “rude, insolent, or angry” touching, as does Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b). Id. at 669. The Board of Immigration Appeals determined this offense qualified as a crime of domestic violence under 18 U.S.C.S. § 16 and ordered Flores’ removal from the country. Id. at 671. Upon review, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit found the issue was whether the offense created under the Indiana Code
Despite the varying interpretations of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii), the United States Supreme Court declined to grant certiorari when presented with this issue. 43

The Plain Language of the Statute Should Control: The First, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits

The First, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeals applied the principles of statutory construction in their interpretation. 44 When faced with determining whether statutes similar to Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) satisfied the “use of physical force” element, as required in § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)’s definition of a crime of domestic violence, the First, Eighth and Eleventh Circuits concluded the language of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) is clear and unambiguous. 45 Courts must follow the language of the statute as long as the plain meaning is neither unreasonable nor absurd. 46 The First, Eighth and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeals have concluded the application of the plain meaning of the term “physical force” in § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) produced neither unreasonable nor absurd results. 47 All three circuits acknowledge the impossibility for an offender to touch an individual in an offensive manner without exerting some level of physical force, thus holding that de minimis touches satisfy the physical force requirement. 48

The First, Eighth and Eleventh Circuits referenced 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(8) to further support the position. 49 Subsection 922(g)(8) contains a qualifying clause, which limits its reach to a specific subset of physical force: the type reasonably expected to cause physical injury. 50 In United States v. Nason and United States v.
Griffith, the United States Courts of Appeals for the First and Eleventh Circuits respectively, found Congress revealed its intent by restricting the scope of § 922(g)(8) with a modifying clause, but declined to do so in § 922(g)(9).51

Additionally, in United States v. Nason, the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit found the legislative history suggested Congress did not intend to include an injury requirement.52 While on the Senate floor, Senator Frank Lautenberg observed under the final amendment that the ban applies to crimes that have, as an element, the use or attempted use of physical force, or the threatened use of a deadly weapon.53 The United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit found Senator Lautenberg’s comments helpful when construing the federal statute.54 The court concluded Senator Lautenberg’s comments demonstrated the principal purpose of substituting “crimes involving the use or attempted use of physical force” for “crimes of violence” in § 922(g)(9) was to enlarge the scope of predicate offenses covered by the statute.55

The Element of Physical Force Must Be Violent: The Seventh and Ninth Circuits

The United States Courts of Appeals for the Seventh and Ninth Circuits have interpreted “the use or attempted use of physical force” element in § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) differently.56 When examining broad state assault and battery statutes, the Seventh and Ninth Circuits have asserted de minimis touches cannot be categorized as violent based on the definition of a misdemeanor crime of domestic stalking or threatening an intimate partner . . . in reasonable fear of bodily injury to the partner or child; and includes a finding that such person represents a credible threat to the physical safety of such intimate partner or child; or by its terms explicitly prohibits the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against such intimate partner or child that would reasonably be expected to cause bodily injury.

Id. (emphasis added).

51 Nason, 269 F.3d at 16–17 (“After all, when Congress inserts limiting language in one section of a statute but abjures that language in another, closely related section, the usual presumption is that Congress acted deliberately and purposefully in the disparate omission.”); see Duncan v. Walker, 533 U.S. 167, 173 (2001) (“It is well settled that where Congress includes particular language in one section of a statute but omits it in another section of the same Act, it is generally presumed that Congress acts intentionally and purposely in the disparate inclusion or exclusion.”); Griffith, 455 F.3d at 1342 (“If Congress had wanted to limit the physical force requirement in § 922(g)(9), it could have done so, as it did in the last clause of the preceding paragraph of the same subsection . . . but that is not what Congress did. That it did not speaks loudly and clearly.”).

52 Nason, 269 F.3d at 17–18.

54 Nason, 269 F.3d at 17.

55 Id.

56 See generally Flores, 350 F.3d at 668–69; United States v. Norbinga, 474 F.3d 561, 563–64 (9th Cir. 2006).
violence. These courts reasoned that a strict interpretation in cases involving de minimis touching leads to harsh results. The Seventh and Ninth Circuit Courts of Appeals assert that in order to avoid collapsing the distinction between violent and non-violent offenses, the word “force” requires a different legal meaning in contrast to its general scientific meaning.

In order to preserve the distinction between violent and non-violent offenses, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, in United States v. Flores, established a standard requiring force of a violent nature. This standard criminalizes force meant to cause, or likely to cause, bodily injury. The court conceded establishing such a benchmark for the use of “physical force” set a qualitative, rather than quantitative, line. However, the court elaborated that without creating a minimum boundary for the use of force, the distinction between the use of “physical force against” and “physical contact” would be indistinguishable, despite having different legal meanings.

Establishing a standard requiring the use, or attempted use, of violent physical force is significant when examining a broad battery statute like Wyoming Statute 57 See infra notes 58–74 and accompanying text (discussing the exclusion of de minimis touches when considering the “physical force” requirement in § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)).

---

58 Flores, 350 F.3d at 671–72.

Every battery entails a touch, and it is impossible to touch someone without applying some force, if only a smidgeon. . . . Every battery involves “force” in the sense of physics or engineering, where “force” means the acceleration of mass. A dyne is the amount of force needed to accelerate one gram of mass by one centimeter per second per second. . . . Perhaps one could read the word “force” in § 16(a) to mean one dyne or more, but that would make hash of the effort to distinguish ordinary crimes from violent ones.

Id.

59 Id. at 672 (“[W]e must treat the word force as having a meaning in the legal community that differs from its meaning in the physics community.”); Belles, 338 F.3d at 1068 (stating the use of deadly weapon as discussed in the federal definition is a gravely serious threat in comparison with the ungentlemanly conduct criminalized by the Wyoming statute).

60 Flores, 350 F.3d at 672; see Solorzano-Patlan v. INS, 207 F.3d 869, 875 n.10 (7th Cir. 2000); Xiong v. INS, 173 F.3d 601, 604–05 (7th Cir. 1999).

61 Flores, 350 F.3d at 672.

Otherwise, “physical force against” and “physical contact with” would end up meaning the same thing, even though these senses are distinct in law. This is not a quantitative line (“how many newtons makes a touching violent!”) but a qualitative one. An offensive touching is on the “contact” side of this line, a punch on the “force” side; and even though we know that Flores’s acts were on the “force” side of this legal line, the elements of his offense are on the “contact” side.

Id.

62 Id.

63 Id.
§ 6-2-501(b) because of the criminalization of de minimis touching. In Flores, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit analyzed a broad Indiana battery statute incorporating “rude, insolent, or angry” language similar to the Wyoming statute. The court found the elements of petitioner’s battery conviction could not properly be viewed as a “crime of violence” given the broad range of conduct criminalized by the Indiana statute.

United States v. Belless

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals decision in United States v. Belless is significant because the court interprets the same Wyoming statute at issue in Hays. In Belless, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit addressed whether Wyoming’s battery statute satisfies the “use of physical force” element required by the § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) definition of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence. The Belless court, using the doctrine of noscitur a sociis, concluded Wyoming’s battery statute does not embrace conduct rising to the level of the federal definition’s requirement for “physical force.” Specifically, the court held the prong of the statute criminalizing rude, insolent, or angry touches failed to meet the element of “physical force” required by § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii). The court found § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) required the violent use of force against the body. The court reasoned that Wyoming’s legislature drafted the more inclusive battery statute to criminalize behavior that often leads to serious violence. The court presumed it may be the state’s objective to allow police to arrest individuals for de minimis touches and therefore ensure such acts would not escalate into violence. In light of this standard, the Belless court held Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) does not satisfy the § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) definition of a crime of domestic violence.

---

64 See id. at 666.
65 Id. at 668; IND. CODE § 35-42-2-1(a) (2008) (“A person who knowingly or intentionally touches another person in a rude, insolent, or angry manner commits battery, a Class B misdemeanor.”).
66 Flores, 350 F.3d at 672 (pleading guilty in the United States District Court for the District of Montana to illegally possessing a firearm in violation of § 922(g)(9)).
67 Belless, 338 F.3d at 1065. While Belless’ prosecution took place in the Ninth Circuit, the predicate offense in this matter was a violation of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b). Id.
68 Id.
69 Id. at 1067–68. The doctrine of noscitur a sociis provides that "the meaning of doubtful words may be determined by reference to associated words and phrases." Id. at 1068.
70 Id.
71 Id.
72 Belless, 338 F.3d at 1068 (enabling police to arrest and intervene in such confrontations in order and avoid the risk that rude touchings will escalate into further violence).
73 Id.
74 Id. at 1069.
Split of Authority within the United States District Courts of Wyoming

Prior to Hays, a split of authority existed within the United States District Courts for the District of Wyoming as to whether 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) includes de minimis touching.75 The Chief Judge for the District of Wyoming, William F. Downes, examined the issue in United States v. Gonzales.76 As in Hays, Gonzales allegedly violated Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) and was subsequently indicted under 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9).77 Judge Downes agreed with the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit’s analysis of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) in Belless.78 Accordingly, the court held Wyoming’s battery statute, which criminalizes nonviolent conduct, does not satisfy the element of physical force in § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) and dismissed the charge against Mr. Gonzales.79

However, Judge Clarence Brimmer and Judge Alan Johnson, Wyoming’s other two United States District Court Judges, sided with the reasoning of the First, Eighth and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeals on the issue presented in Hays.80 In United States v. McCue, Judge Brimmer held the language of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) was not overinclusive and criminalized conduct sufficient to meet the element of “physical force” in § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii).81 Similarly, in United States v. Rael, Judge Johnson found the position of the First, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeals better aligned with the principles of statutory interpretation and legislative intent.82 By favorably citing Griffith and Nason, Judge Johnson held Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) met the physical force requirement of § 922(a)(33)(A)(ii).83 In essence, the court effectively rejected Belless’ interpretation

75 See infra notes 76–87 and accompanying text.
77 Id.
78 Id.
79 Id.
80 See infra notes 81–87 and accompanying text.
81 United States v. McCue, No. 05-CR-222, Order Denying Def.’s Mot. Dismiss Count Two of the Indictment (Nov. 17, 2006) (“Therefore, under the plain meaning rule, ‘the unlawful touching of another in a rude, insolent or angry manner’ made illegal by the Wyoming battery statute satisfies the ‘physical force’ requirement of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii).”).
82 United States v. Rael, No. 06-CR-183 Order Denying Def.’s Mot. to Dismiss Count One and Two of the Indictment (Nov. 27, 2006).
83 Id. at 6.

This Court’s decision that Wyoming’s battery statute is sufficient to qualify as a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence under § 922(a)(33)(A) is supported by the plain meaning of the statute. This court takes particular note of the fact that § 921(a)(33)(A) does not specify any particular degree of physical force required before an act may be considered a “misdemeanor crime of domestic violence.” Instead, the statute plainly refers only to the use or attempted use of physical force.

Id.
of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b). The court, just as in Nason and Griffith, declined to read § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) as requiring physical force be violent, when Congress itself declined to include modifying language.

The district courts for the District of Wyoming, like the Federal Circuit Courts of Appeals, were split as to whether the definitional requirements of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) for the use or attempted use of physical force are met by de minimis touches. However, in Hays, the Tenth Circuit interpreted § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)’s physical force requirement differently than any other court to previously rule on the issue.

Principal Case

A panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit narrowly decided Hays by a two-to-one vote with Circuit Judge Seymour authoring the opinion for the majority. The court adhered to precedent in cases where a defendant contests whether a prior conviction is a crime of violence and applied the categorical approach. The categorical approach does not involve a factual inquiry, but rather an examination of the statute under which a defendant was charged, and an examination of that prong on its face. The categorical approach permits a court to look beyond the statute to the facts of the prior conviction only in certain circumstances.

Majority Opinion

The court began its analysis by examining the text of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9) and 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii). Because Hays’ appeal turned on the

---

84 Id. at 7.
85 Id.
86 See supra notes 44–87 and accompanying text.
87 See infra notes 93–107 and accompanying text.
88 See generally Hays, 526 F.3d at 674.
89 Id. at 676; see also Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575, 600 (1990) (finding persuasive authority in the holdings of the Courts of Appeals which mandate a formal categorical approach looking only to the statutory definitions of the prior offenses, not to the particular facts of those underlying convictions).
90 Hays, 526 F.3d at 676 (“Such review does not involve a subjective inquiry into the facts of the case, but rather its purpose is to determine ‘which part of the statute was charged against the defendant and, thus, which portion of the statute to examine on its face.’”).
91 Id. (“When the underlying statute reaches a broad range of conduct, some of which merits an enhancement and some of which does not, courts resolve the resulting ambiguity by consulting reliable judicial records, such as the charging document, plea agreement, or plea colloquy.”).
92 Id. at 676; see also Leocal v. Ashcroft, 543 U.S. 1, 8 (2004); United States v. Sanchez-Garcia, 501 F.3d 1208, 1212 (10th Cir. 2007); McGraw v. Barnhart, 450 F.3d 493, 498 (10th Cir. 2006).
interpretation of the term “physical force,” and the fact that neither 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9) nor § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) provided a definition for the term, the court turned to Black’s Law Dictionary for guidance.93 The court found the definitions implied the term “physical force” requires something more than mere contact.94 The court contended its interpretation—that physical force entailed something more than de minimis touches—conformed to what the United States Supreme Court and the Seventh and Ninth Circuits had suggested.95 With this notion of “physical force” in mind, the court noted the United States Supreme Court’s interpretation of “crime of violence” in Leocal v. Ashcroft, as well as the Seventh Circuit’s interpretation in Flores v. Ashcroft, to support its holding that “physical force” requires violence.96 Additionally, the court examined the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals’ interpretation of “physical force” in United States v. Belless, as well as its own interpretation in United States v. Sanchez-Garcia.97

The court observed the record did not indicate whether Hays had violated the “unlawfully touching” prong or the “recklessly causes bodily injury prong” of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b).98 According to the court, without any information regarding Hays’ underlying conviction, both prongs of the Wyoming battery statute must satisfy the federal definition of a crime of domestic violence.99 Under the modified categorical approach, the court concluded each prong must satisfy 18 U.S.C. § 922(a)(33)(A)(ii)’s definition, or Hays’ prior conviction under the Wyoming Statute could not support the charge in his federal indictment.100

---

93 BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY 537 (8th Abridged ed. 2005) (defining “force” as “power, violence, or pressure directed against a person or thing,” and the term “physical force” as “force consisting in a physical act, esp. a violent act directed against a robbery victim”).

94 Hays, 526 F.3d at 677.

95 Id. (“Consistent with these definitions, the Supreme Court and both this circuit and others have suggested that physical force means more than mere physical contact; that some degree of power or violence must be present in that contact to constitute physical force.” (internal quotations omitted)).

96 Id; Leocal, 543 U.S. at 11 (“The ordinary meaning of this term, combined with § 16’s emphasis on the use of physical force against another person (or the risk of having to use such force in committing a crime), suggests a category of violent active crimes that cannot be said naturally to include DUI offenses.”); Flores, 350 F.3d at 672 (“Perhaps one could read the word ‘force’ in § 16(a) to mean one dyne or more, but that would make hash of the effort to distinguish ordinary crimes from violent ones.”).

97 Hays, 526 F.3d at 678 (”[F]orce refers to ‘destructive or violent force.’” (quoting United States v. Venegas-Ornelas, 348 F.3d 1273, 1275 (10th Cir. 2003))).

98 Id. Due to the restrictions of the modified categorical approach, the only document in the record containing any information about the circumstances of Hays’ underlying conviction was the pre-sentence report; a document the court could not examine to resolve ambiguity. Id.

99 Id.

100 Id.
In analyzing the first prong of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) forbidding “rude, insolent, or angry” touching, the court discerned the Wyoming statute incorporates the common law rule and any touching, however slight, constitutes battery.\textsuperscript{101} However, the court reasoned the common law rule has become antiquated, as many states have moved away from the broad definition due to the Model Penal Code’s influence on state substantive law.\textsuperscript{102} Accordingly, the court found the first prong of Wyoming’s assault and battery statute criminalized conduct which did not satisfy the definition of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence set forth in 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii).\textsuperscript{103}

The court next examined the Congressional Record and the legislative history of 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9).\textsuperscript{104} The court found that during the debate of what later became 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(9), Senator Lautenburg repeatedly referred to individuals such as “wife beaters” and “child abusers,” suggesting Congress’ concern was violent offenders, rather than those who have merely touched another in a rude manner.\textsuperscript{105} The court determined Congress broadened the scope of the firearm prohibition to include individuals employing violent force in non-felony crimes.\textsuperscript{106}

\textit{Dissenting Opinion}

Judge Ebel wrote a dissenting opinion arguing the court’s holding was not supported by the principles of statutory construction or wise public policy.\textsuperscript{107} Judge Ebel, unlike the majority, agreed with the reasoning of the United States

\textsuperscript{101} Wayne R. LaFave, Substantive Criminal Law §16.2 (2d ed. 2007).

\textsuperscript{102} Hays, 526 F.3d at 679 n.2; see, e.g., UTAH CODE ANN. § 76-5-102(1)(c) (West 1953) (criminalizing behavior which intends or actually causes bodily injury); COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. §§ 18-3-202 to -204 (West. 2004) (criminalizing behavior in which the offender must intend to injure or actually cause bodily harm to the body of another, or act with an extreme indifference to the value of human life).

\textsuperscript{103} Hays, 526 F.3d at 679 (“Indeed, one can think of any number of ‘touchings’ that might be considered ‘rude’ or ‘insolent’ in a domestic setting but would not rise to the level of physical force discussed [in § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)].”).

\textsuperscript{104} Id.

\textsuperscript{105} Id.

\textsuperscript{106} Id. at 680.

These comments make clear that Congress broadened the scope of § 922(g) to encompass misdemeanor crimes of domestic violence not out of a hope to keep guns out of the hands of individuals who may have inflicted de minimis touches on their spouses or children, but to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers who previously fell outside the bounds of the statute because they were convicted of misdemeanors rather than felonies due to “outdated thinking” or plea-bargains.

\textsuperscript{107} Id. at 682 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
Courts of Appeals for the First, Eighth and Eleventh Circuits, and found the language of the statute clear and unambiguous, therefore, the plain meaning should control. Judge Ebel concluded Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) does not criminalize incidental contact, but rather deliberate touches. From his perspective, these types of intentional touches constitute the kind of aggression Congress meant to include in the enactment of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii).

Judge Ebel criticized the majority’s heavy reliance on United States v. Leocal. In his opinion, Leocal was not on point because the Florida statute did not include a mens rea requirement, while Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) clearly incorporates a mens rea requirement.

In addition, Judge Ebel argued the court’s reasoning was misguided based on the language of the statutory scheme. In Judge Ebel’s opinion, the statutory language of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) is clear and unambiguous, therefore, the court did not need to judicially graft qualifying language onto § 922(g)(9). Judge Ebel asserted an examination of § 922(g)(8)(C) demonstrated Congress had the capacity to add modifying language to § 922(g)(9). Such a finding made it clear that Congress purposely left the qualifying language broad enough to incorporate all types of force, including de minimis touches.

---

108 Hays, 526 F.3d at 682 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
109 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting).
110 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting).
111 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting); see Leocal, 543 U.S. at 7. From a scientific perspective, every touch does include some level of physical force, but something more is required from a legal standpoint. Id.
112 Hays, 526 F.3d at 682–83 (Ebel, J., dissenting); see Streitmatter v. State, 981 P.2d 921, 924 (Wyo. 1994).
113 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
114 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting); see Duncan, 533 U.S. at 173 (2001).
115 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
116 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting).
Furthermore, the actual language of the standard troubled Judge Ebel. Judge Ebel argued the majority’s reliance on United States v. Leocal and United States v. Flores led it to require that “physical force result in some sort of harm or injury.” According to Judge Ebel, imposing a standard requiring the use of physical force result in either harm or injury provides little clarity as to what qualifies under the federal definition of a crime of domestic violence. Judge Ebel asserted, “[o]nce we start down the slippery slope left open by the majority opinion of qualifying what constitutes ‘physical force,’ our work will never be done.”

In Judge Ebel’s opinion, the court’s adoption of the physical force standard was neither necessary nor helpful. Judge Ebel proffered the court’s opinion was not supported by the plain language of the statute, the overall statutory scheme in which § 922(g)(9) is included, or by wise public policy. Judge Ebel concluded Congress adopted the more applicable standard based on its own appreciation for the difficulties of defining qualifying conduct. Like the First, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeals, Judge Ebel would have held the plain language of the statute should control.

Analysis

The reasoning of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit in Hays is problematic for several reasons. First, the court erred by concluding the 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) physical force requirement entails something more than de minimis touching. Second, the court ignored its own previous interpretation of the term “physical force.” Third, the court incorrectly imposed a legal standard requiring the use of physical force result in physical harm or injury. Fourth, rather than seizing the opportunity to clarify whether 117 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting) ("It imposes an amorphous legal standard to determine whether conduct involving ‘physical force’ rises to the level of a predicate offense for purposes of section 922(g)(9).”).

118 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting).
119 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting).
120 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting) (acknowledging the problematic effect of a standard requiring the use or attempted use of physical force result in either harm or injury because there is no bright line rule for quantifying “physical force”).
121 Id. at 685 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
122 Id. at 682 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
123 Id. at 685 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
124 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting).
125 See infra notes 131–97 and accompanying text.
126 See infra notes 131–62 and accompanying text.
127 See infra notes 163–74 and accompanying text.
128 See infra notes 175–86 and accompanying text.
Wyoming’s battery statute satisfies the use of physical force requirement of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii), the court further complicated the law. Additionally, this section discusses the Hays decision’s practical implications on the firearm rights of individuals convicted under broad state assault and battery statutes within the Tenth Circuit.

The Plain Language of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) is Clear and Unambiguous

The holdings of the First, Eighth and Eleventh Circuits are more consistent with the principles of statutory interpretation and legislative intent compared to the other circuits. The first step in any statutory exercise is to examine the language of the statute itself. If the statutory language has a plain meaning, the courts are bound to follow that language. The term “physical force” is an elementary concept, readily understood within the legal community. Given the clarity of “physical force,” the plain meaning of the language must control. Furthermore, Congress is entitled to define the terms governing crimes freely. For a court to find ambiguity from a straightforward phrase such as “physical force” on the basis that it disagrees with Congress’ effort is improper. Supposing Congress’ definition of a qualifying misdemeanor does not encompass all types of force when the language clearly supports the proposition is unfounded.

The faulty reasoning of the Seventh and Ninth Circuit Courts of Appeals, on which the Tenth Circuit relied, frustrates the congressional intent behind § 922(g)(9). The Hays court’s reliance on Leocal, Flores, and Belless leads to a misguided interpretation of “physical force.” As Judge Ebel points out in the dissent, the 129 See infra notes 187–91 and accompanying text.

130 See infra notes 192–97 and accompanying text.
131 United States v. Rael, No. 06-CR0183, Order Denying Def. Mot. to Dismiss Count One and Two of the Indictment (Nov. 27, 2006) (finding the statutory language of Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) has a plain meaning and without ambiguity, a court must follow that language).
132 Hays, 526 F.3d at 677; Griffith, 455 F.3d at 1342; Nason, 269 F.3d at 15–16.
134 Nason, 269 F.3d at 16; Griffith, 455 F.3d at 1345 (“Unlike the Seventh Circuit, we do not feel compelled to reach a result at war with common sense, particularly when doing so would require us to alter the plain language of what Congress has written.”).
135 Nason, 269 F.3d at 16.
136 Id. at 17.
137 Id.
138 Id.
139 Hays, 526 F.3d at 685 (Ebel, J., dissenting); see Hayes, 129 S. Ct. at 1081 (construing § 922(g)(9) to exclude the domestic abuser convicted under a generic use-of-force statute would frustrate Congress’ purpose).
140 Hays, at 682–84 (Ebel, J., dissenting).
court’s reliance on \textit{Leocal} is misplaced.\footnote{Id. at 682--83 (Ebel, J., dissenting); \textit{Leocal}, 547 U.S. at 7. In \textit{Leocal}, the United States Supreme Court was asked to consider the meaning of the term “crime of violence.” \textit{Id.} However, the \textit{Hays} court was being asked to weigh the meaning of the term “misdemeanor crime of domestic violence.” \textit{Hays}, 526 F.3d at 683.} The court shows a broad deference to the United States Supreme Court’s statement in \textit{Leocal} that it could not “forget that it was ultimately . . . determining the meaning of the phrase ‘crime of violence.’”\footnote{\textit{Hays}, 526 F.3d at 683 (Ebel, J., dissenting).} However, rather than determining the meaning of the phrase “crime of violence,” the \textit{Hays} court was asked to decipher the meaning of the term “misdemeanor crime of domestic violence.”\footnote{\textit{Id.} (Ebel, J., dissenting).} As Judge Ebel noted, the court gave no weight to the misdemeanor qualifier.\footnote{\textit{Id.} (Ebel, J., dissenting).} By its very nature, a misdemeanor crime will involve less violence than a felony.\footnote{\textit{Id.} (Ebel, J., dissenting); \textit{see infra} notes 148--56 and accompanying text.}

Likewise, the court’s dependence on \textit{Flores} is mistaken.\footnote{\textit{Id.} (Ebel, J., dissenting).} In \textit{Flores}, the Seventh Circuit considered 18 U.S.C. § 16, a statute similar to § 921(a)(33)(A) (ii).\footnote{\textit{See Flores}, 350 F.3d at 668. The Immigration and Nationality Act defined a “crime of domestic violence” in terms of 18 U.S.C. § 16 as a crime that has, an element, the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another. \textit{Flores}, 350 F.3d at 668; Petitioner Brief-Appellee, \textit{supra} note 19, at 9.} The court seems to adopt \textit{Flores’} scientific discussion of “force” as a clear indication that Congress did not intend to include \textit{de minimis} touches in the definition of § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii).\footnote{\textit{Hays}, 526 F.3d at 678; \textit{see supra} notes 60--66 and accompanying text for discussion of “force” in \textit{Flores}.} The \textit{Hays} court’s approval of this discussion is problematic because it deviates from the plain language of § 921(a)(33)(A) (ii).\footnote{\textit{Griffith}, 455 F.3d at 1345.} The physics discussion in \textit{Flores} addresses matters wholly unrelated to the practical application of the law.\footnote{Petitioner Brief-Appellee, \textit{supra} note 19, at 20; \textit{Flores}, 350 F.3d at 673 (Evans, J., concurring) (“We recently observed that critics of our system of law often see it as ‘not tethered very closely to common sense.’”).} \textit{Flores’} examination considers hypothetical situations such as snowballs, spitballs and paper airplanes.\footnote{\textit{See supra} note 58 and accompanying text.} These situations are the type where minimal amounts of “dynes” or “newtons” of force are used against others.\footnote{Petitioner Brief-Appellee, \textit{supra} note 19, at 20; \textit{Griffith}, 455 F.3d at 1345.} Rarely would an individual be prosecuted for offenses involving spitballs and paper airplanes.\textsuperscript{153} In the real world, a person is prosecuted for actual battery against the body of another.\textsuperscript{154} A consideration of time and resources in relation to the circumstances surrounding battery prosecutions within the American legal system leads to the rational conclusion that individuals rarely face prosecution for little more than a minimal exertion of "dynes" or "newtons."\textsuperscript{155}

The \textit{Belless} court's reasoning presents the same analytical problems as \textit{Flores}.\textsuperscript{156} Following \textit{Belless}' misguided discussion of Newtonian mechanics, the court stated its goal in this exercise is to allocate criminal responsibility, not take part in a discussion of physics.\textsuperscript{157} This statement is clearly erroneous as the function of assigning criminal responsibility belongs to Congress.\textsuperscript{158} A reading of a statute contradicting the plain meaning ultimately frustrates Congress' intent for the broad application of these sections.\textsuperscript{159} The \textit{Hays} court found the reasoning of the Ninth Circuit in \textit{Belless} persuasive and consequently added its own qualifying language to 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii).\textsuperscript{160} As in \textit{Hays}, imposing a standard requiring violent physical force when Congress itself did not include such a requirement is inappropriate.\textsuperscript{161} If Congress had intended the term "physical

\textsuperscript{153} Petitioner Brief-Appellee, \textit{supra} note 19, at 20; \textit{Flores}, 350 at 672 (Evans, J., concurring) ("For one thing, people don't get charged criminally for expending a newton of force against victims.").

\textsuperscript{154} Petitioner Brief-Appellee, \textit{supra} note 19, at 20; \textit{Griffith}, 455 F.3d at 1345 (inferring that prosecutions based on a minimal exertion of force are divorced from common sense and have little or no basis in the real world).

\textsuperscript{155} Petitioner Brief-Appellee, \textit{supra} note 19 at 20; \textit{Flores}, 350 at 672 (Evans, J., concurring); \textit{Skakun}, \textit{supra} note 39, at 1852 ("And as a practical matter, it is likely that actual violence, not mere touching, is the basis of almost all assault and battery convictions for making physical contact with a domestic intimate.").

\textsuperscript{156} \textit{United States v. Rael}, No. 06-CR-183, Order Denying Def's Mot. to Dismiss Count One and Two of the Indictment (Nov. 27, 2006) (rejecting the Ninth Circuit's analysis of "physical force" based on Newtonian mechanics and the associated language requiring "threatened use of a deadly weapon").

\textsuperscript{157} \textit{Id.; Griffith}, 455 F.3d at 1344; \textit{see U.S. Const. art. I, §8, cl.2 (granting Congress the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution).}

\textsuperscript{158} \textit{United States v. Gonzalez}, No. 05-CR-276-D Order Granting Mot. Dismiss Count Three (Mar. 29, 2006); \textit{see also Pioneer Inv. Serv. v. Brunswick Assocs., 507 U.S. 380, 388 (1993) ("Courts properly assume, absent sufficient indication to the contrary, that Congress intends the words in its enactments to carry 'their ordinary, contemporary, common meaning.'").}

\textsuperscript{159} \textit{United States v. McCue}, No. 05-CR-222-B, Order Denying Defendant's Motions to Dismiss Count One and Two of the Indictment (Nov. 27, 2006) at 7.

\textsuperscript{160} \textit{See Hays}, 526 F.3d at 681 (holding Wyoming Statute § 6-2-501(b) does not satisfy the "use of physical force" element in § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) because from a legal standpoint, "physical force" entails more than mere touching).

\textsuperscript{161} \textit{United States v. McCue}, No. 05-CR-222-B, Order Denying Defendant's Motions to Dismiss Count One and Two of the Indictment (Nov. 27, 2006) at 7; \textit{see supra} note 51 and accompanying text (discussing the impropriety of adding language which Congress itself did not include).
force” to actually mean violent physical force, it could have expressly included the distinction in the statute’s text.162

Hays’ Interpretation Strays From Precedent

Another problematic aspect of the Hays decision is the court’s disregard for its own previous interpretation of the term “physical force.”163 It is important to note that until Hays, the Tenth Circuit had not ruled on the precise issue presented in Hays.164 However, it previously interpreted analogous statutory language in United States v. Treto-Martinez.165 In Treto-Martinez, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals considered whether a prior felony conviction under Kansas’ aggravated battery statute constituted a “crime of violence” for the purposes of U.S.S.G. § 2L1.2(b)(1)(A).166 The U.S.S.G. § 2L1.2(b)(1)(A) definitional requirements are similar to those of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) as both include as an element the “use or attempted use of physical force.”167 The Kansas aggravated battery statute, like the Wyoming statute, prohibits “intentionally causing physical contact with another person when done in a rude, insulting, or angry manner with a deadly weapon.”168 In Treto-Martinez, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals held the intentional touching of another with a deadly weapon in a “rude, insolent, or angry manner” did involve the use of physical force.169

162 See Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting); Nason, 269 F.3d at 16–18; Griffith, 455 F.3d at 1342.
163 See supra notes 163–69 and accompanying text.
164 Petitioner Brief-Appellee, supra note 19, at 9.
166 Treto-Martinez, 421 F.3d at 1157. Treto-Martinez pled guilty in the United States District Court for the District of Colorado to unlawful reentry by a deported alien who had been removed from the country subsequent to commission of an aggravated felony. Id. The Sentencing Guidelines advised a court to increase punishment by sixteen levels if a defendant remains in the country after a felony conviction that is a crime of violence. U.S. SENTENCING GUIDELINES MANUAL § 2L1.2(b)(1)(A) (1991). Treto-Martinez appealed the sentence imposed. Treto-Martinez, 421 F.3d at 1157. The court concluded the defendant’s prior conviction for aggravated battery constituted a crime of violence. Id. Causing physical contact with a deadly weapon in a rude, insulting or angry manner was sufficient to constitute actual use of force under the sentencing guidelines and would always include as an element the threatened use of physical force. Id.
167 Treto-Martinez, 421 F.3d at 1159; U.S.S.G. § 2L1.2(b)(1)(A) provides that:

(A) a conviction for a felony that is (i) a drug trafficking offense for which the sentence imposed exceeded 13 months; (ii) a crime of violence; (iii) a firearms offense; (iv) a child pornography offense; (v) a national security or terrorism offense; (vi) a human trafficking offense; or (vii) an alien smuggling offense, increase by 16 levels . . . .

Id.
168 Treto-Martinez, 421 F.3d at 1159.
169 Id. at 1162.
Despite interpreting “physical force” in other contexts, Hays was not a case of first impression for the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit, as it has spoken on domestic abuse issues dealing with the interpretation of “physical force.”

Therefore, Hays’ interpretation of “physical force” undermines the principles of stare decisis. The court’s interpretation of “physical force” in the instant case offends the integrity of the judicial system because it did not treat analogous situations alike in accordance with the doctrine of stare decisis.

Hays Imposes an Amorphous Legal Standard

As indicated by Judge Ebel in the dissent, the court imposes an amorphous standard to determine whether conduct involving physical force rises to the level of a predicate offense. The Hays court’s addition of modifying language to § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) is improper given the overall statutory scheme. Additionally, implementing a standard requiring physical force result in either harm or injury stifles the promotion of judicial efficiency. In the dissent, Judge Ebel pointedly asked what constitutes harm or injury to an element of physical force. Judge Ebel asserted that imposing a standard requiring the use of physical force result in either harm or injury has the potential to flood the courts with litigation.

---

The Supreme Court considers stare decisis—the obligation to adhere to past opinions—to be “indispensable” to the “rule of law.” In describing the doctrine, the Court has explained that “when an opinion issues for the Court, it is not only the result but also those portions of the opinion necessary to that result by which we are bound.” This constraint helps legitimize the judicial system by requiring the Court to treat like cases alike.

Id.

Under the doctrine of stare decisis, when a court has laid down a principle of law as applying to a certain set of facts, it will adhere to that principle and apply it to all future cases where the facts are substantially the same. The doctrine is the means by which courts ensure that the law will not merely change erratically but will develop in a principled and intelligible fashion.

Id.

173 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting).

174 Griffith, 455 F.3d at 1343.

175 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting); Drew C. Ensign, The Impact of Liberty on Stare Decisis: The Rehnquist Court From Casey to Lawrence, 81 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1137, 1141 (2006) (“Stare decisis serves many important interests, including: (1) promoting judicial economy by avoiding relitigation of issues.”).

176 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting).

177 Id.
The Hays court’s imposition of its standard shows no regard for the rule laid out by the United States Supreme Court in Duncan v. Walker.

When construing the meaning of a statute a court should, if possible, prevent any clause, sentence, or word from being superfluous, void, or insignificant. As stated by the Courts of Appeals in the First, Eighth and Eleventh Circuits, Congress clearly intended to leave the language of § 922(g)(9) broad because it chose to place qualifying language in the previous section. Furthermore, the legal standard adopted in Hays frustrates the concept of judicial economy. Such a standard will inundate the Tenth Circuit with questions relating to the quantitative aspects of both harm and injury. This standard, like the standard adopted by the Seventh and Ninth Circuits, serves as a qualitative measure. Therefore, by adopting this standard, the panel of the Tenth Circuit provides no guidance to lower courts facing the issue in the future.

Hays Provides No Clarity in Relation to § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)

Given the split of authority within the federal courts, the Hays court had the opportunity to provide clarity as to whether Wyoming’s battery statute satisfies the federal definition of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence. However, unlike the United States Courts of Appeals for the Seventh and Ninth Circuits, the Tenth Circuit imposed a standard requiring physical force result in either harm or injury to the victim. Prior to Hays, the only court to consider whether the language of Wyoming’s assault and battery statute satisfies the physical force requirement was the Ninth Circuit in Belless. Rather than finding the Belless court’s reasoning persuasive, the panel of the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals adopted a different legal standard, rendering the Tenth Circuit a “lone ranger” in 178 Duncan, 533 U.S. at 175; see supra note 51 and accompanying text (discussing the impropriety of finding Congress’ omission of a word in one section, but not in another, intentional and purposeful).

---

179 Duncan, 533 U.S. at 175.

180 Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting).

181 Id. at 684–85 (Ebel, J., dissenting).

182 Id. at 685 (Ebel, J., dissenting) (asserting the standard will necessitate the courts to hear a substantial number of cases to define what types of injuries will merit an interpretation of the application of physical force).

183 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting).

184 Id. (Ebel, J., dissenting).

185 See Hays, 526 F.3d at 684–85 (Ebel, J., dissenting) (discussing the various interpretations of the federal courts on the issue).

186 Id. at 677–78 (insisting force be violent in nature, the sort that is intended to cause bodily injury, or a minimum likely to do so).

187 Id. at 680; see generally Belless, 338 F.3d 1063.
At the time of the Hays decision, none of the federal circuits to rule on the issue supported the imposition of language requiring the use, or attempted use, of physical force to result in either harm or injury.

Implications of Hays

The United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit’s holding in Hays serves as a considerable victory for individuals convicted under state assault and battery statutes criminalizing de minimis touches. Given the circumstances of how state court systems process misdemeanor cases, potential now exists for widespread restoration of firearm rights, especially in states with all encompassing assault and battery statutes. As in Hays, misdemeanor cases often pass through the courts without the inclusion of facts in the charging document, plea agreement, or plea colloquy. When combining these circumstances with the restraints of the categorical approach, state assault and battery statutes like Wyoming’s are rendered useless when serving as the predicate offense for federal prosecutions under the Lautenberg Amendment. The Hays court’s holding provides individuals convicted in the Tenth Circuit under broadly authored state assault and battery statutes like Wyoming’s an avenue for restoring their right to possess firearms.

Despite Congress’ intention to prohibit “wife beaters” and “child abusers” from possessing firearms, Hays in effect restores firearm rights under the categorical approach.

---

188 See Hays, 526 F.3d at 684 (Ebel, J., dissenting) (asserting the standard adopted leaves the Tenth Circuit standing alone in requiring “physical force” to result in either harm or injury).

189 Id. at 674; see supra notes 39–86 and accompanying text (asserting that a person cannot make contact with the body of another without exerting some level of physical force, particularly of an insulting or rude nature); see supra notes 60–74 and accompanying text (asserting the term “physical force” in relation to the definitional requirements of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) require the violent use of force against the body of another).

191 Id.

192 Stanley Z. Fisher, Just the Facts, Ma’Am: Lying and the Omission of Exculpatory Evidence in Police Reports, 28 NEW ENG. L. REV. 1, 17 (1993) (discussing the omission of factual information which is important in criminal proceedings); Hays, 526 F.3d at 676.

Even the categorical approach, however, permits courts to look beyond the statute of conviction under certain circumstances. When the underlying statute reaches a broad range of conduct, some of which merits an enhancement and some of which does not, courts resolve the resulting ambiguity by consulting reliable judicial records, such as the charging document, plea agreement, or plea colloquy.

193 See Hays, 526 F.3d at 681. The categorical approach limits a sentencing court to examining the statutory elements of the predicate offense. Id. at 676.

194 Id. at 681.

195 Id.
CONCLUSION

The United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit’s decision in Hays blurs the law regarding whether the federal definition of a crime of domestic violence under 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii) criminalizes de minimis touches.196 The Tenth Circuit must reconsider the legal standard requiring “physical force” to either result in harm or injury in order to satisfy 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii).197 The disarray surrounding 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(33)(A)(ii)’s definitional requirement for an element of “physical force” must compel the United States Supreme Court to hear a case on this precise issue and therefore provide clarity and uniformity to the lower courts in the near future.198

196 See supra notes 39–86 and accompanying text.
197 See supra notes 39–197 and accompanying text.
198 See supra notes 126–97 and accompanying text.