In addition to the services to the state and the legal profession reported by this individual activity of the faculty, the law school held two noteworthy institutes. Thirty-five Wyoming lawmakers attended the second biennial Legislators School, directed by Professor Rames, and over one hundred lawyers and bankers studied the new Uniform Commercial Code at the Fourth Annual Institute on Continuing Legal Education, at which speakers of national reputation explained this very important piece of legislation. Arrangements for these programs were made by Professors Rames and Rudolph, and each spoke on a principal topic of the meetings.
